A Scary Sight
Joseph watches as his fellow fighters take on a group of British soldiers, known as "redcoats" because of their bright-red uniforms.
Joseph Plumb Martin was still a boy when he became an American soldier. Would he survive his first battle?

BY LAUREN TARSHIS | ART BY GARY HANNA
Explosions shook the ground. Smoke filled the air. Fifteen-year-old Joseph Plumb Martin was lying in the dirt, trying to stay alive.

It was August 27, 1776. America and England were fighting the first big battle of the Revolutionary War, in New York. Joseph had begged his family to let him join the American army. He thought being a soldier would be exciting. And he was sure America would win!

But now Joseph knew that the Americans were doomed. Hundreds of soldiers were dead. The cries of injured men rose up into the sky.

It seemed Joseph had two choices: surrender or die.

PAUSE AND THINK: How was being a soldier different from what Joseph expected?

A New World

Joseph was born in 1760. The United States wasn’t a country yet. America was still mostly wilderness, except for a strip of land along the East Coast. This doomed: going to fail surrender: give up or stop fighting because you know you won’t win wilderness: a wild, natural area where few people live land was ruled by England. It was divided into 13 areas, or colonies. Joseph lived in the colony of Connecticut.

Hundreds of thousands of people had come to the colonies from England and other parts of Europe. Rules were too strict there. People had few choices about their religion, their jobs, or even their friends. In the colonies, people had more choices—but they still had to follow England’s rules.

Not everyone in the colonies had a good life. Hundreds of thousands of Native American people were killed. They died of diseases brought by Europeans. They died in fights over land. They starved after being kicked out of their homelands. During this time, African people were dragged to America in chains. They were forced to become slaves.

Meanwhile, Americans had become angry at England. They said it wasn’t fair that they had to follow England’s rules.

America’s anger toward England smoldered like a fire. And then, in April 1775, that anger exploded into war. The American Revolution had begun.

Getting Ready to Fight

At first, the thought of fighting scared Joseph. But his courage grew. Soon he wanted to join the new American army. In June 1776, his family said yes. Joseph sailed to New York City. This big, bustling city had been turned into an American army camp.

“I was now what I had long wished to be,” he later wrote. “A soldier.”

But Joseph wasn’t really a soldier yet. And neither were most of the nearly 20,000 men and teenagers in the American army. They were just regular people, like Joseph. Some could barely

---

Inset: where Joseph and his fellow soldiers fought in the summer of 1776

---

slaves: people who are owned by other people and must work for them for free

smoldered: burned slowly

bustling: fast-moving, busy fire a gun. Their leader, General George Washington, had never led an army before. All summer, he struggled to turn this group into strong fighters.

Joseph didn’t complain about shooting practice or endless marching. He choked down the Army meals, such as wormy biscuits and flavorless meat. He coped with the summer heat and the stink of garbage and human waste. Still, he was excited to be a soldier.

PAUSE AND THINK: What did Joseph and others need to learn to become soldiers?

Surprise Attack

Meanwhile, the British planned a huge attack on New York. They’d sailed ships packed with weapons. Joseph could see the soldiers on those ships. They were waiting like caged beasts. They were hungry for blood and ready to strike.

They struck early one morning at the end of August. While it was still dark, more than 15,000 British soldiers arrived on the shores of Brooklyn. Brooklyn was a village across the river from New York City. There were a few thousand American soldiers there. They were all caught by surprise.

Washington rushed to send more men to Brooklyn. Joseph was one of them. He saw a scene of horror. Men were lying in the grass: “some with broken arms, some with broken legs, some with broken heads,” Joseph wrote. He and other soldiers tried to stop the British from reaching American forts.

But the British forces were too powerful. Hundreds of American soldiers were killed or injured.

PAUSE AND THINK: What did Washington do when the British attacked Brooklyn?

Secret Escape

Even with all the blood and fear, General George Washington stayed calm. Then he came up with a brilliant plan. He would sneak the American forts: buildings for troops that are strengthened to protect against attacks army out of Brooklyn during the night. He sent an urgent message: “We need boats in Brooklyn now!” Because it was dark and foggy, thousands of soldiers were able to sneak back to New York City. This included Joseph. In the morning, the British attacked the forts. They were shocked to find them empty.

The Americans still lost the Battle of Brooklyn. But their army had survived. And they would keep fighting.

The American Revolution lasted for eight years. Towns were burned down. Thousands of soldiers were killed. Many Americans felt afraid all the time. But in 1783, the war finally ended. The British surrendered. America had won the war.

Joseph fought during the entire war. He later moved to Maine, married, and raised five children. He died at age 89. He always remembered the terrors of war. But he was also proud that he helped America win its fight for freedom.

urgent: very important

PAUSE AND THINK: How long did the American Revolution last? Who won?

THINK AND WRITE

Pretend you’re Joseph in 1776. Write a journal entry explaining how hard it is to be an American soldier. Include at least five details from the story. Send it to “War Contest” by May 15. Five winners will each receive I Survived the American Revolution, 1776, by Lauren Tarshis. See details on page 2.