

DOUBLECROSS

MISSION TITANIC

JUDE WATSON

SCHOLASTIC INC.

For all the clue hunters on the message boards— we couldn't do this without you!

— J.W.

Copyright © 2015 by Scholastic Inc.

All rights reserved. Published by Scholastic Inc., Publishers since 1920.
SCHOLASTIC, THE 39 CLUES, and associated logos are trademarks and/or registered trademarks of Scholastic Inc.

No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording, or otherwise, without written permission of the publisher.

For information regarding permission,
write to Scholastic Inc.,
Attention: Permissions Department,
557 Broadway, New York, NY 10012.

Library of Congress Control Number: 2014953663

ISBN 978-0-545-74781-3

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1 15 16 17 18 19/0

Credits:

Cover images: ship and pieces by Freddie Bethune for Scholastic; gears © cherezoff/
Shutterstock and © stiven/Shutterstock; blueprint © amgun/Shutterstock; ship blueprint © Hein Nouwens/Shutterstock; Titanic drawing by the-blueprints.com.
Interior images: vial page 10 © studioVin/Shutterstock; vial labels page 10, smart phone page 145, and emei piercer page 170 by Charice Silverman for Scholastic; ship page 145 by Freddie Bethune for Scholastic.
Book and cover design by Charice Silverman

First edition, March 2015

Printed in the U.S.A. 23

Scholastic US: 557 Broadway • New York, NY 10012
Scholastic Canada: 604 King Street West • Toronto, ON M5V 1E1
Scholastic New Zealand Limited: Private Bag 94407 • Greenmount, Manukau 2141
Scholastic UK Ltd.: Euston House • 24 Eversholt Street • London NW1 1DB

CHAPTER 1

Attleboro, Massachusetts

Revenge is sweet, but humiliation is sweeter.

And world domination is a definite plus.

He stood on the knoll overlooking the mansion. It had burned and it had been rebuilt—stronger, better. Just like him.

The children were inside, the ones who thought they knew what they were doing.

The undeserving.

His plan was in place. He would defeat them, own them. What they'd done to the Cahill family was unforgivable. Made the Cahills soft and stupid, vulnerable, open, a loose confederation of “family” instead of the dense, glittering network of brilliance and strength it should be. Exchanging ideas about how to share rather than control and dominate.

Grace, you would weep if you saw this. You were never soft. You had that ruthless streak. Until the end, when your fear overcame your reason.

You gave it all away.

It had taken years of planning, but it was together now.

Rest easy, children. Your world is about to implode.

CHAPTER 2

First, there was Napoleon Bonaparte.

He set out to conquer the world and succeeded. Became a general at twenty-four. Crowned himself Emperor of France about ten years later. He did spectacularly well until that disaster at Waterloo, when the Brits beat the pants off him.

What happens when you surpass your role model?

Ian Kabra smiled as he climbed onto a step stool and faced the mirror. So much handsome stared back. It was almost too much. He smoothed back the lock of dark hair that kept falling in his eyes. Imperfection was just annoying.

At seventeen, he was head of the most powerful family in the world.

Plus, he was taller.

Take that, Cousin Napoleon!

Ian didn't think that genetics was destiny, but it was a definite plus having Napoleon in his family tree, as well as Catherine the Great, Benjamin Franklin, and Winston Churchill. The greatest strategic minds in the history of civilization were all related in the twisting branches and tendrils of the Cahill family line. Even today, the real titans—giants of industry, technology, finance, art, music, athletics, endurance—were all related to him, from Nobel Prize-winning scientists to Edith Laverne Oh-Flurrie of Norman, Oklahoma, who patented a new sewing machine bobbin at the age of ninety-two and treated herself to a new armchair recliner on the proceeds. Which were somewhere in the neighborhood of fifty million dollars.

Edith was an Ekat, the branch of the Cahills that was studded with science and technology geniuses. The Tomas were exceptional physical specimens. The Janus, the creatives, were the artists and dreamers who set the world on fire. Ian's own branch, the Lucians, were, like Cousin Napoleon, brilliant strategists and thinkers. And then there were the Madrigals, the under-the-radar branch that had come out of hiding only recently. Ian had been born a Lucian (thank goodness—Ian still felt a deep loyalty to them), but was a Madrigal as well. The Madrigals were now the leaders of the Cahills because they were the only branch the others agreed to trust.

Yes, the Cahills were exceptional, but they needed someone to lead them. Enter Ian Kabra.

From a control panel by his bed he could activate screens that would put him in touch with Cahill family leaders all over the world. He could put the entire mansion on lockdown, order people to do what he planned and strategized, and request his morning tea.

“You sure you want another quarter inch, bud? Seems kinda short.” The tailor stood in the master closet, squinting at Ian’s trouser legs.

From his position on the step stool, Ian frowned down at the tailor. “Mr. Funicello, I gave you precise measurements from my London tailor. And you delivered trousers that were an inch and one half too long. There is no mistake whatsoever.” He gestured at his suit. “This must be done right. I have an important meeting in a week.”

“So you said already. Three times.” The tailor set out his box of materials and, sighing heavily, bent over to fold Ian’s trouser hem.

What Americans didn’t know about tailoring! Trousers should be a precise length. What was hard about that? A graceful curve on the shoe, not cascading like a waterfall around your ankles. His cousin Jonah Wizard’s pants? Painful to look upon.

Living in the United States after London . . . well, it had its challenges. You had to put up with the horrors of tea bags, for one thing. And he was constantly having to explain things. How when he told the driver to put his suitcase in the boot, the driver just stared at him. As if trunk made any more sense than boot? And when at the cinema (twenty films in one theater!

Now there's a concept!) he suggested to his cousin Hamilton Holt that they try the lift instead of the crowded escalator, Hamilton had lifted him in his arms and carried him up the stairs. Humiliating! As a Tomas, his cousin had an impressive physique, but surely even Hamilton's brain could grasp the British term for "elevator."

He was homesick for London, for fog, real marmalade, and people who understood hand-tailoring and the class system. People who knew how important his family was, even though he had disowned them. Only his father was left, and Ian was perfectly happy never to see him again.

Raised by vicious snobs, it was true. But snobs with money and style.

Ian admired his suit, appreciating the mirrors that gave him a total view of his appearance. He'd had to install them when he'd moved into the master bedroom. He'd created a secret safe room and taken the opportunity to expand the closet. As the former head of the family, his cousin Amy Cahill had supervised the renovation of the half-destroyed mansion, but a girl who lived in gray T-shirts and blue jeans did not understand the importance of walk-in closets.

A week from now, Ian would lead his first annual Cahill Family Summit meeting. Branch leaders from all over the world would attend on videoconference, and notable Cahills would stream into Grace Cahill's mansion. Every detail had to be right, from the scones and clotted cream of the elaborate English tea to the technical challenges of screens and cables and the smooth operation of the Gideon, the Cahill family's own satellite.

Not just right, Ian amended, his gaze unfocused as the tailor measured his inseam. Lockstep perfect.

Because lately, just in the past few weeks, things had seemed a bit . . . wobbly.

From the very beginning, the squabbling Cahills had been hard to manage. He hadn't given Amy enough credit. She'd been a powerhouse in an ill-fitting T-shirt, and everyone had looked up to her. They'd known that she and her brother had defeated Cahill enemies and fashioned the family into an organized unit. It had been her vision that had rebuilt the mansion, had pushed the technology for the satellite, had brought everyone together for conferences and retreats, had tightened the digital network. How she'd gotten them to agree, and to agree to disagree, he still didn't know.

He thought it would be fun to give orders. He didn't expect people to question his decisions! The truth was, he thought he'd be a far superior leader to Amy. And he was, in many ways, of course . . . but why did the family seem to be slipping from his grasp? Branch leaders not checking in, prominent Cahills not taking his calls . . . the egos he had to deal with . . .

The tailor had finished marking the hem. He laid out a row of pins.

"Be sure it's straight."

“Sure, bud.”

“I am not your bud, Mr. Funicello. Are you aware of who pays your bill?”

Cara Pierce burst into the room, breathless. “Ian!”

Ian grabbed at his trousers. He wasn’t wearing a belt, and he wasn’t entirely sure all his seams were sewn. “Cara! Did you ever hear of a quaint custom called knocking?”

“Oh, please, I knew your tailor was here.”

“Precisely!”

“Listen, Your Highfalutingness, we’ve got a problem.”

Cara strode toward him, impossibly beautiful and incredibly annoying. As a matter of fact, impossible and incredible basically defined his second-in-command. Cara made fun of him constantly, wore a baseball cap in the house, ate potato chips from a can, and could probably beat him up. She was also most likely smarter than he was. She was definitely, absolutely, completely not his type.

Except . . . she was his soul mate. She was his one true pairing. She was the sugar in his cup of tea, the butter on his crumpets, the tinsel on his tree. His destiny.

She just didn’t know it yet.

She raked a hand through her chin-length blond hair and held up her smartphone. “I’m having problems logging in to Gideon.”

“Atmospheric disturbance?”

“Could be. But why is the Cahill Summit on my calendar for today?”

He turned back to the mirror. “Don’t fret, it’s next week.”

“If you can tear yourself away from yourself, take a look at your phone.”

“Can’t you see I’m in the middle of something important? OW!”

“Sorry, bud.”

“You stuck me!”

“Ian, look at your phone!”

He gave in and fished his phone out of his jacket pocket. He frowned. “It does say today. Must be a software glitch. Isn’t that your area? You’re the master hacker.”

“It’s not a glitch; it was moved,” Cara said. “Just a few minutes ago. The meeting is now scheduled to take place in five minutes!”

“Well, maybe on our phones, but not in actuality.”

“Well, in actuality, I can no longer log on to Gideon to check the network. This feels hinky.”

“Hinky? What sort of word is that? If you keep using slang, I’m going to have to start watching American television, and nobody wants that. I can’t make a decision based on emotion. Tell me an observable fact, and —”

Maybe he’d gone too far. Because suddenly Cara’s beautiful clear green eyes had turned icy and she was coming at him hard. Feet first.