

My Favorite Place: The Barn

Both of these pictures depict ordinary objects that I see whenever I go to the barn.

The purpose of this photo is to capture some of the things I see on a regular basis when I go to the barn.

I liked the way this pic created a focal point, the light at the end of the barn.

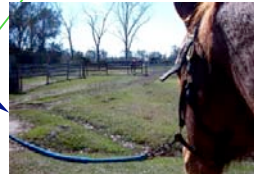

This photo shows how much freedom the horses have, and it has nice lines and the subject is very clear.

This pic had great lines in it b/c it shows the fence line/posts, the shadow also created a desired effect.

I liked this pic b/c of the way these trees formed an overhang over the road. I thought this would make an interesting effect.

I thought the concept of this picture was cool, instead of a bird's eye view, its the point of view from a horse's angle.

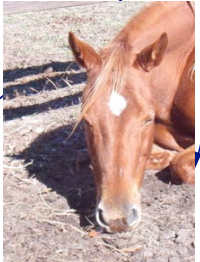

In this picture I was trying to capture the "rule of thirds" w/ Hill (the horse) as my subject.

This photo is supposed to show the viewer the openness of the pastures.

In this picture I liked how the branches formed an overhang framing this trail.

In this picture I wanted to capture the peaceful atmosphere of the barn by capturing this horse taking a morning nap.

I liked this picture b/c of this unique tree, I thought this was an awesome tree, and I wanted the viewer to see how huge the trees here are.

My purpose for this picture was to show what a contrast these huge trees had against the open skyline.

In this picture I went for the "framing your view" affect.

In these two pictures I am framing the view. The tree and the fence both act as natural frames.

In these pictures it shows the horses of the barn, and portrays how happy they are here.
